Np-7995-02 - Np-7995-02 - Np-7995-02 Carl Bildt's election is taking place on Sunday, after which, he will be tasked with forming a government. Already, we have a glimpse of what that government might look like, in the form of ÖB-ÖC-Socialist "front": In a hard-left coalition of just five parties, SPS, ÖC, ABF, ÖFP and LP, we have a government that is shaping up to be something very much like the old East German Bloc. But then there is a problem: the Communists are behind the Social Democrats in the polls. Indeed, they have overtaken them in the polls. The Communists are the clear second party. The Social Democrats are the clear third. According to the public opinion polls, the Social Democrats have gained so much ground that they have managed to become the largest opposition party, ahead of the Greens. In the run up to the elections, it was more or less predicted that the Social Democrats would form a minority government. Of the four leading parties, only the Greens have not changed their position. The Greens were the clear fourth party last time out, just behind the Social Democrats. The Sweden Democrats are the fifth leading party. In fact, this poll indicates that the Sweden Democrats have overtaken the Social Democrats as the second-largest party, with 25.5 per cent support. The SD, which doesn't have a single MP in the Riksdag, is the only party that is actually ahead of the Social Democrats in the polls. The SD is currently the only party to beat the 35 per cent of votes that the Social Democrats were polling before the elections. The SD has overtaken the Social Democrats in the polls. That's not possible. I'm Swedish and I'm almost certain that no one would elect someone who advocates for what is clearly fascism into a position of national importance. Nevertheless, the swing is significant. The Social Democrats have been the biggest opposition party for decades. They were basically the only party that dared to call out the Bloc, and they dominated the political landscape for the last century. But since the 82157476af
